without interruption.

"A very large part of the war supplies must be exported from New York," added Mr. Bush. "They must be given freedom and no excuse will answer for their not going. The facilities of the port, already strained, must be further expanded. Two methods were available, the taking over of the port by the military authorities or the cooperation through a war board of everybody interested in New York. The latter course was adopted, and it is up to the people of New York to show that they can speed up the machinery of this port to meet the demands to be made upon it.
